(57) Abstract :
Prevention of cyber-attacks on healthcare organizations using IoT, Cloud Computing and Machine Learning approach Abstract: They are attempting to exploit flaws that have emerged as a result of these significant changes in how the healthcare sector operates, which are aimed at saving lives and improving treatment and patient care through the use of new technology. Industry insiders will share their perspectives on the current challenges confronting healthcare IT and cybersecurity professionals. The healthcare industry faces numerous cybersecurity challenges. As a result of healthcare facility attacks, a variety of issues have arisen, ranging from malware that compromises system integrity and patient privacy to distributed denial of service (DDoS) attacks that prevent facilities from providing patient care. Health care presents unique challenges in comparison to other critical infrastructure sectors such as power and water. Cyber-attacks on the health care industry have the potential to have far-reaching consequences beyond financial losses and compromised data. Due to its access to sensitive data, ransomware, a type of malware, can endanger people's lives. Algorithms and techniques for machine learning are now critical components of any effective cybersecurity system. This is also not possible, as machine learning cannot function properly without thoroughly examining the data it uses. The Internet of Things (IoT) is a network of billions of devices that can communicate without the intervention of a human. The Internet of Things is a term that refers to this. It is irrelevant how quickly the Internet of Things (IoT) expands because it must contend with numerous cyberattacks in a perilous internet environment. To address this issue, practical methods for securing IoT networks, such as network anomaly detection, must be developed. While attacks cannot be completely avoided in the real world, early detection is critical for effective defence in the here and now. A traditional high-end security solution will not work on an IoT system due to the small size and processing power of IoT devices. The amount of time that IoT devices can remain connected without human intervention has increased. Network security tools that incorporate machine learning and other forms of intelligence will be required for individuals who wish to maintain the security of their networks. There has been considerable research recently into the use of Machine Learning (ML) solutions to detect attacks. There has been little research into the effectiveness of these solutions in detecting attacks in Internet of Things (IoT) networks. The purpose of this research is to examine various machine learning algorithms for detecting attacks on the Internet of Things quickly and effectively (IoT). Numerous detection algorithms are being evaluated on the newly added Bot-IoT dataset. Seven different machine learning algorithms were evaluated and found to perform well. We identified novel features in our dataset and compared them to those discovered previously. These newly discovered characteristics outperformed prior research findings.
